Mr. Pyle Said

Notes of Howard Pyle's Monday Night Lectures, taken by Olive Rush and Ethel Pennewell Brown in 1904, and transcribed by Carolyn Anderson.

Mr. Arthur's "Hessians at Trenton/Christmas Night Celebration"

You haven't imagined the succession of events leading up to this scene. It is midnight and I see this group of stout and proud Hessians sitting around the board.

Merry tales are told—the cup is passed and they become mellow—with the wine and the warmth of the room—they are oblivious to all save the jollity of the occasion.

The smoke from their pipes fills the room and through the hazy light I see these men with waistcoats thrown back—a glass is upturned—and the place is fairly reeking.

All is confusion when from the night outside a messenger enters with a note—which is tossed aside unopened.

Your composition will betray every thought you had while making it—if it is done in pleasure it will give pleasure to the beholder.

Every great picture is conceived with enthusiasm—then follow days, months and perhaps years of hard concentrated effort when the painter often leaves his studio overwhelmed and almost discouraged.

Finally the light seems to come and the work is finished in the spirit in which it was first undertaken.

Every great masterpiece in the world shows that it was created in this way—you can feel the inspiration of the conception—the patient working out of the idea and the enthusiasm of the finish.

Tuesday noon:

Paint your pictures by means of the lights—imagine that you are bringing moving beings out of a gray chaos and not that you are drawing men with black paint.
